Silva Góis Silva Góis is a parish in the municipality of Pombal in Portugal. It is the northernmost parish of the municipality. The parish church is dedicated to Saint James the Greater (São Jacinto), is a late 19th-century church rebuilt in the final years of the Spanish monarchy, and which is considered one of the most remarkable examples of Manueline architecture in Portugal. The northern section of the church is later Baroque, with the sacristy, the sacristy chapel, the nave and the choir. The southern section is late 19th-century Baroque.

History The parish of Silva Góis was created in 1680, and its first parish priest was António de Oliveira, vicar of Pombal, in 1681. This first priest dedicated a small church dedicated to Saint Joseph, which was constructed with stone and wood, but which was destroyed by the earthquake of 1755. After the earthquake of 1755, the parishioners decided to have a new church, and a stone and wood church was built between 1756 and 1759. This church was later destroyed by the earthquake of 1755, and a new church was built in the same place in 1763-1764. At this time, the priest of the parish was Carlos Ribeiro, who was active in the parish of Pombal, as well as in the parish of São João da Pesqueira. The new church was dedicated to Saint James the Greater, and was expanded with a sacristy, a sacristy chapel, the nave and the choir. In 1838, the parish joined the Church of Pombal, and 82157476af
